CRITICS ON BOWERY ARTISTS...

Writing about ARMSTRONG's Bowery show, Roberta Smith in the New York Times said, "At once improvisational and carefully carpentered, these paintings explode toward the eye, like nature on first sight, at its most welcoming and irrepressible. In more ways than one, this is an inspiring show." FRANKS was reviewed in the Shelter Island Reporter by Annette Hinkle. Writing about FRANKS on twocoatsofpaint.com, Sharon Butler said that her paintings "start with an observed spatial relationship, but eventually the color commandeers the situation, turning the piece into something completely different..." In a book called Classical Mythology in Context, Laura Maurizio wrote about a work of GORZEGNO's: "Resembling a fresco (a painting on plaster), this painting introduces the idea of Persephone's death: she seems to be decomposing before the viewer's eyes..." On his blog, onviewat.com, GOODRICH wrote about KOTULA, saying "Kotula's fifteen small still lifes reveal a great deal of sharp observation, and also a deft synthesizing of impressions. They show the power of color – of not just tone, hue, and intensity, but also that inexplicable quality of density or pressure – to re-enact the workings of light." PARDEE was the subject of an interview by Sarah Granett in "Dime and Honey," a web publication... Writing in the Trenton Times, Janet Purcell said of ROSENTHAL's work that "Rosenthal seems to be exploring her core feelings. Abstracted architectural shapes that suggest abodes and figures appear in many of the works..." In a catalogue essay on ROSENTHAL, Peter Champion wrote, "She is that rare artist whose formal knowledge has fused so thoroughly with her inventiveness that they appear indistinguishable." GOODRICH wrote about SERIO on his blog onviewat.com that "His paintings, all depicting street and park scenes around Riverside Park, celebrate the transformative power of sunlight, capturing vistas in interlocking zones of shadow and illumination."
